Crites believes that the drama of such ancients is successful because it depicts life.n He says that both classical and neoclassical favor of rules and unity (time,. n) are in some ways more attractive than random mess. In both cases, the rules are, on the one hand, rigid and predictable, and, on the other hand, dynamic and unpredictable.4 Star Wars and the Terminator films are clear examples of the science fiction genre. The appearance of the first films coincided with the invention of electronics. But these technologies were not significant at the time of their creation, so Star Wars was not destined to become a cult. While many sci-fi fans wanted to see what the future would look like, they were limited by film technology and willing to accept anything but what was not in their minds. 5 A classic example of a film built around special relationships between people, - "Star Trek". The crew of the Enterprise ship is made up of men and women with different psychological types, which allows them to work as a team. The superhuman abilities of the crew members partly explain their success. In Star Trek, elements of science fiction become more significant than in stories about the average person.6 As literary scholar David Rabin says, the science style doesn't have to be strict, but it should be based on what actually exists.
