Flickr is ending support for the HTC Vive as an app, and is no longer accepting new Vive developer kits. Developer kits are what the Vive is powered by. The devices will still be sold, but you'll no longer be able to make game apps that aren't specific to a VR headset. The reasoning behind the move is so that devs can focus more on the Vive—at least, that's what HTC says. "We are currently no longer accepting new HTC Vive Developer Kits," the company's developer relations team said in a blog post. "We encourage developers to consider whether they would like to continue developing and publishing VR apps for the HTC Vive as an app and platform, as the focus will be on our current Vive headset offering. If so, we will continue to support existing apps through the regular channels." The blog post gives a reason as to why devs might want to focus on the Vive: it's the most successful consumer VR headset, and there aren't many apps. According to its numbers, though, Facebook-owned Oculus has dwarfed Vive in terms of developer interest and uptake. Facebook's Oculus Go also exists, so there's no need to focus on the consumer headset segment. Photo by @elysion on Instagram Oculus has also been selling its new Go hardware since last month, so the company clearly has no need to support any of its developer initiatives. Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg said at the Oculus Connect 5 conference in November that he doesn't really foresee Oculus as supporting the Rift or Rift S for "a little while." Meanwhile, last week Valve announced a new standalone VR headset in partnership with HTC, the HTC Vive Cosmos. It's a free update for the original HTC Vive.
