Please note, Endzeit is in active development and can be considered experimental and unfinished. The game is not officially released, and most likely never will. The game was not only developed by one person, but rather a very big community and is a collaborative effort. Each contributor improves or modifies a certain part of the game. Latest versions of the executable are available under the Linux version. Endzeit can be found on steam. Small update to the game, as of version 1.7.2 the game is now available in the play version. -Overhauled almost all textures -New sound effects -Various bugfixes and improvements Wow. this was a massive effort. It's taken around 5 years to make this game, and it shows, and it's awesome. A must play for any fans of FPS and Automata. :D Any suggestions of things to add? Tibis 27-07-15, 11:14 AM > I'd suggest adding a feature whereby your weapon can only be used while standing up. Hi, I was thinking along the same line as the OP. I also think the sniper rifle has a bit too much spread.  Fossil Echo is a short and challenging, story driven platformer with hand drawn 2D graphics. Set in a fantastical world, it tells a wordless tale of adventure and mystery. Features Varied and detailed environments Hand animated 2D characters Over 15 minutes of fully animated cutscenes A wordless, mysterious story Breathtaking orchestral score Very dynamic and demanding platforming gameplay Tense stealth mechanics Well hidden secrets and unlockables No HUD or on-screen indications Speedrun-Friendly (in-game timers.) Story Influenced by the Oddworld series, Ico, and Shadow of the Colossus, as well as Studio Ghibli films, Fossil Echo tells the story of a young boy and his journey to climb a giant tower in the middle of the sea. How and why he got there are questions that will be answered via playable flashbacks during his ascent. The game offers over 15 minutes of fully animated cutscenes and the story is told without any dialogue or written text. Gameplay Fossil Echo mixes old-school, "die & retry" platforming gameplay with some stealth elements. As in Abe's Oddysee and Another World, you have little margin for error; precise movement and timing is required to get through and avoid confrontation, as the character is young, weak, and unable to fight or kill, most of the time. Art Fossil Echo features a detailed art style, with pre-rendered/hand painted backgrounds and hand animated 2D characters. Adopting the style of animated film, it presents an array diverse environments, from lush forest to snow covered tower. With no HUD or any indications displayed on screen, the game aims at immersing you from start to finish. Sound The world of Fossil Echo is brought to life by over two hours of unique, original music by John Robert Matz (Gunpoint, Rodina) and sound design by Gordon McGladdery (Rogue Legacy, Fantastic Contraption). Music and sound work in concert to set the mood and highlight the story

What's new:

s Pictographs are a group of simple picture-making art forms which have served the Aboriginal people of the Australian continent from at least 50,000 years ago. The word "pictograph" typically refers to the oldest and most basic type of picture, the pictograph. Its form is a relatively simplistic depiction, often in black or red pigment, of a subject. It is generally taken from or based on a natural or traditional object or scene. It may be made with simply a stick, or under a bowl containing pigment. Some picture groups, from prehistoric times to the present, have been used both for communication and artistic purposes. The second type, which incorporates the idea of movable images, is known as a petroglyph or engraving, and the processes for making the two types of images are different. In either case the effects are incised into a piece of rock. Without the ability to engrave the rock, especially the relatively soft stone of the Australian continent, pictographs and petroglyphs have remained relatively unchanged, a type of rock art that is easily seen in the central and western deserts of Western Australia, and in some areas of the Northern Territory. With the coming of white settlement in the nineteenth century, that state of Aboriginal culture experienced decline, and the surviving indigenous population experienced a loss of the ability to make and use artistic images. It has always been difficult to distinguish the two types of image. During the last century, many new categories and names have been applied to the many types of picture made by the Aborigines of Australia. Some such as the Gordon Stone Pictographs of the southern Northern Territory have been systematically dated and identified. An early review of Central Australian and aborigine rock art and symbols was provided by the naturalist and anthropologist Joseph Frank, in 1919: The term “rock art” has been used in a context including the works produced by Aborigines, and by natural processes such as petroglyphs, to describe incised or etched images and other marks cut into rock, including caves. Such forms bear little resemblance to picture-making by human beings. Australian Aboriginal rock art falls into several categories, sometimes included under the term “aurignacian” art. The term “wall painting” also covers the stone wall paintings of some parts of Australia. Definition and classification of Australian Aboriginal rock art "Pictographs" and "pictorial aboriginal rock art"
