Or, their developer should get an apology for wasting the developer's time and energy. It's not really that difficult to create a website that works. A: Your registration doesn't seem to be working. You need to fill in all fields and click the signup button. Once you click the signup button, you will be directed to a page like this: You are just not logged in. You need to login first. You can either do it manually with your user and password (whatever you used to login here), or by following the "Login via" link to the right. Q: Can you use the KineticJS drag and drop example as an example for the Google Native Client platform? So I'm creating a simple web application that will use the Google Native Client platform. I've decided that I want to use the html5 KineticJS library to create a canvas element for the user to interact with. I have created a web page that has all the HTML, CSS, and JAVASCRIPT that I need to make this work. I have some of the application already working. I want to go back and make an example of drag and drop using the KineticJS library, but I am not sure where I should start. I am interested in the file system. Is there somewhere I could look for example code or documentation to make this work? A: Have a look at Google Gears Kinetic is probably not what you really want, but maybe a middle ground is to look at: Leaflet ... and either implement a bunch of utility functions in it, or use some of their code. Q: How to convert an array of struct to a list? I have an array of struct: struct fmt0 { uint32_t id; uint32_t data_index; uint32_t len; uint32_t num_bytes; uint32_t bytes[]; }; I'm trying to output something like this into a file, as list of [{id}, {data_index}, {len}, {num_bytes}, {bytes}] array as well as split it over multiple lines, however no matter what I'm trying, I still getting an error: prog.cpp:38:35
