Self-reported health status We assess subjective health status by asking respondents if they would be classified as excellent, good, fair or poor. In the Gallup China 2006 survey, Many studies have highlighted that subjective health status is an important predictor of mortality and may therefore be instrumental in predicting health services use (Wei and Liu, 2001). This is one of the few studies to use subjective health status as a predictor of health services use in China. In the WHO Global Adult Tobacco Survey, health was shown to be a significant predictor of service use. In the survey, only 1% of those with moderate or severe pain stated that they had used tobacco over the preceding three months. There was a statistically significant relationship between the experience of moderate or severe pain and tobacco use over the previous three months (approximately 17% reported tobacco use in this category), indicating that experienced pain significantly lowered the likelihood of using tobacco. A similarly small proportion of those who had a diagnosed chronic disease stated that they had used tobacco over the preceding three months (between 1% and 3%, depending on the disease). Subjective health status is more likely to be associated with experience of pain and disease than objective health status. This may explain why subjective health status is a strong predictor of tobacco use. For example, it may be that smoking is a coping strategy for feeling ill, and this may be more common in China. The data suggest that if a service such as the RNTCP were to make referrals to health facilities, patients who suffered from pain or disease might, in the absence of a specific reason for using the service, be less likely to visit a health facility than patients without these conditions. In contrast, frequency of healthcare usage for medical examinations was not significantly related to either subjective health status or any of the objective health status measures. In addition, the definition of the health services variable could partially account for the weak relationship between health services usage and subjective health status, as the variable included referrals to health services as well as use of health services. Health status as a predictor of tobacco use Subjective health status was related to both cigarette and snuff use. After controlling for a number of demographic factors, the odds of smoking were 22% lower for smokers who reported being in good or excellent health, compared with smokers who reported being in fair or poor health. Of the other health measures, the degree of limitation and the number of days of pain/discomfort in the past month were significantly related to smoking. People in better health were 6d1f23a050
