Kenwood Programming Software KPG-44D KCH-10.Procedural learning in the human brain: learning and processing of onset timing in a visuomotor task. We studied the effects of trial-to-trial performance differences on the neural correlates of learning in a new visuomotor task. Subjects performed a complex precision grip and lift task using a steady-state visual feedback. Subjects always produced the same grip, except that they produced a different grip, depending on the instruction preceding the trial, either "grip high" or "grip low". The task performance was evaluated with regard to the forces and timing of the movement. Learning was defined as an increase in the force and timing of the movement across the two groups. We found that the learning effects, as determined by a significant force increase and an average reduction in movement timing were largest in the "grip low" group. The variation in movement timing across subjects was more closely related to learning than the force. In addition, "grip high" showed an increased movement variability due to trial-to-trial variations in performance. The results suggest that the learning of a new motor command is characterized by an increased variability in movement timing and a subsequent improvement in the efficiency of the temporal organization of movement output. The mechanisms of hyperthermia-induced cardioprotection are not completely understood. Heat shock proteins (HSPs) are a group of highly conserved stress proteins. These proteins form a barrier to maintain normal protein folding in the cell. HSPs are induced by hyperthermia or other stresses including ischemia. Overexpression of HSPs has been shown to protect the cell from subsequent stress insults. The aim of this study is to test the hypothesis that HSPs act as hyperthermia sensors to protect cardiac myocytes. Hypothesis: HSPs contribute to cell protection by serving as hyperthermia sensors and/or mediators of apoptosis. Specific Aims: (1) to examine the effects of HSP70 on hyperthermia-induced apoptosis. (2) to examine the effects of HSP70 on
