Adaptation, health, resilience and resiliency.Effects of dietary L-canavanine on metabolism and reproductive parameters in mice. The effects of dietary l-canavanine on metabolism and reproductive parameters in mice was investigated using male and female Swiss mice. l-Canavanine administration (10, 30, and 70mg/kg body wt/d) from days 6 to 17 of gestation caused a dose-related increase in the rates of weight gain, food intake and water consumption in both male and female mice, with a greater increase observed in males. l-Canavanine also stimulated an increase in liver weight and activity of the key enzymes, ATPase and tyrosine aminotransferase, in both sexes of mice. l-Canavanine administration at 30 and 70mg/kg body wt/d reduced the response of body weight gain to the methoxyfenozide treatment (100 mg/kg body wt/d). Dietary l-canavanine caused an increase in testicular and epididymal weights in both sexes of mice, although epididymal weights were increased more in treated males. l-Canavanine reduced the levels of vitamin B(12), cholinesterase and alkaline phosphatase in both sexes of mice. However, elevation of the activities of aspartate aminotransferase and alanine aminot
