If you're an expert who can tweak presets with the precision and convenience of an app in a toolbox, PS is still the better choice. But if you're an average consumer with a limited knowledge of the ins and outs of your camera, Lightroom is now free and, by the way, really does enable you to work painlessly and quickly. In my experience, it often even surpasses Photoshop in speed and productivity. If the budget is a concern, Lightroom (5) is a great option. I would definitely recommend it to anyone who makes extensive use of imported photos, many of whom are camera-wielding pros. Lightroom can handle tons of file formats (RAW, JPEG, TIFF, etc.), and it comes with a variety of filters and effects that can make imported photos look great. No Photoshop is not an issue, as Lightroom is open source and has a simple learning curve. It's also the only full-fledged desktop program that offers a feature-rich import module. What's more, Lightroom is, at its core, a powerful and clean file management app. There's simply none better. I have had a hard time compiling and selecting all good images from 5,000 CVS files. The main reason. Despite making excellent images, times are gone when it was only possible to make a new file if there was a need to change or correct something. Today, many photographers save their originals and create new image files only when it is necessary to change the image's size, other processing, or format (JPEG or TIFF). Even then, Lightroom 5 allows the re-creation of RAW files and updating and review the editing path and parameters. By this, many photographers can't say how much time they spent in the editing process.
