Overall verdict: I think that Adobe has done a pretty good job with Lightroom 5. It's very easy to use and the interface is guite refined. Even though there is a lot of very useful new functionality, not really much was added. In the end, this version of the famous digital publishing software has added more features but it hasn't added anything that I need. As I noted on the video review of Lightroom 5, Lightroom's improved HDR support had improved considerably, which is a must for me. It's been guite a long time since I had any luck with this kind of produce from my iPad Pro. However, it's important to remember that you still cannot do multicore-optimized HDR captures yet. Process multiple images in a single capture, and all that wonderful software will have to repaint the whole frame before you can process the other images on the same frame. It should not be too difficult to implement, though. As for the Grain and Sharpen improvements, Lightroom still works a bit too "smoothly". I would not personally call this un-natural, but I do find that sometimes it makes photos look a little too obvious. The slider makes it easy to adjust these settings, bringing back the desired effect on the spot. I do not get the impression that Adobe is better at putting lenses on cameras now, but much more at manipulating images. On the plus side, the current noise reduction now has an option to build up instead of crushing the noise, which is a definite plus. However, they should really find a way to combat posterization in Photoshop. As much as I understand the dynamic range compression that Photoshop's advantage, I do not see any way of making the software do it besides crushing the image to get there, which is unacceptable. Plus, the way the Median option is almost like a Gamma 2.2 or less, which is actually not what you want in the first place. Take a look at the video below to see what that looks like in real life.

In our research and interaction with users, we have found that many stores and marketing teams were considering replacing their inventory systems with augmented reality. While the overall experience was better, the augmentation was limited because the data was tied to physical products and not to the people or products that they wanted to associate with. So it was time to go beyond the physical products, and look at how people create and experience their own product and brand experiences. In that context, an augmented reality experience could be unique and personalized according to the customer and brand experience. This gave us the motivation to work with the Adobe Intelligence team to develop a new augmented reality framework for Photoshop.
