The layout of the video editing tools is another nice change for me. Switching tools is often overlooked in reviews because it seems simple and straightforward. But on the Adobe website, it's an important and necessary step to adding a video element. The aforementioned Dreamweaver module is also a little different from what I've seen in other applications, but it's not that hard to figure out. The new video editing features include:

- Draw a Timeline
- Frame and Freeze
- Begin/End, Frame, Start/Stop
- Folder, Split, Paste
- Switch to, Layer
- Tone Curve, Zoom, Pan/Tilt, Warp, Creative Color, Color Picker, Create From, Linear Light, Radial Gradient
- Image Size
- Ruler, Crop
- Lightroom Filter
- Vignette, Vignette Settings
- Image Overlay
- Grain, Grain tool
- Sharpen, Blur, Bleach Bypass
- Configurable Finder

Here's how I found some of the new features for videos in this update. Using the new preset, "Video Effects", I applied effects like Classic Slowmo to a few key footage shots. Next, I used the new Speed Control tool to make the frame rate faster or slower. The result was a sped-up version of the clip without cutting. The Dreamweaver module is designed for inspiration, but it also lets you apply a custom sequence of Adobe Dreamweaver CS6 templates to a Photoshop file. This lets you quickly apply a Dreamweaver site to a new Photoshop file and it's an awesome way to quickly build a site without having to manually add elements. More on that in the "What's New in Video" section.

Greene (toolbox) A greene is a toolbox made of wood or canvas, with a hinged top for storing tools. A greene is similar to nineteenth-century wood or wooden and tin toolboxes, which in turn were based on the prehistoric box-and-mortar, which had a hole in it, the 'Greene' (probably a corruption of 'green manhole cover') and which has been found throughout the ancient world.

Description The invention of the greene has been attributed to eighteenth-century cabinet-makers and toolmakers, though its existence in the eighteenth century was accepted only recently.
